As a young man he joined the British Army and served for over ten years, after which he migrated to Canada and was employed as a mechanic with Alberta Transportation. He was an active outdoor enthusiast and became a member of the Non-Association of Ramblers and Rhinoceros Trackers (NAARTs), a hiking club affiliated with the Canadian Hostelling Association. This group has been described as a "band of gentle anarchists" that "partied, then tracked the noble rhino on foot, by bike, in canoes and kayaks and on cross-country skis across Alberta, British Columbia and the Northwest Territories." As a guide and a member of the hiking club, Farley led many groups to this lake during the 1970s and 1980s. John Farley passed away in June 2003. The name gained wide-spread usage with hikers and guides in the area, as well as officials with Alberta Sustainable Resource Development. The lake is also known locally and amongst the hiking community as "Mud Lake," "Headwaters Lake," "Nodding Onion Lake" and "Allium Lake."
